Letter from the 128th.

CAMP MILLINGTON, near Baltimore,

Soon after our arrival at Baltimore, the reginent was ordered to encamp at Stewart's Wood, situated just outside the suburbs of the city. On Monday evening Col. Cowles was ordered to be ready to move up the road towards Frederick at 7 o'clock the next morning. As the rebel cavalry had taken breakfast that morning within thirteen miles of Baltimore, this looked like a fight. As the arms had not been distributed, the regiment was ordered to turn out in the night This created some alarm, as many believed the enemy were upon us. The regiment moved off however at 7 o'clock, but we had not marched more than three miles before a counter order came for us to move around to the south-west of the city, and encamp on the ground we now oc-cupy. This is a beautiful site, on elevated ground, and commands a charming view of Baltimore and the bay. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad runs round the foot of the hill. Some five or six regiments pass en-route to Washington every day. They are cheered on by our men as they pass. Should Baltimore be approached by the rebels on the Frederick road, we hold a most important position to drive them back, and was our regiment older and well drilled, we could keep off ten-fold the number. A creek crosses the Frederick road at right angles which is fringed by trees, behind which infantry could be posted to good advantage. A battery of the 5th U.S. Artillery occupies the hill with our regiment. Their guns command the road and bridge. In case of an attack they would fire over our heads, the road being higher than the valley which we would occupy.
